To W.E. Bautcher. Esq.

Dear Sir"

In reply to your letter of the 9th inst I beg to say, (1) The stole has been declared an illegal vestment in the Church of England. That applies to the ordinary black stole as much as to a coloured one. The fact of its having crosses on it does not in my opinion make it more illegal.

(2). Turning to the East at the ~~or~~ recitation of the Creed is a practice peculiar to the Anglican Church and dates from the time of Archbishop Laud. So far as I am aware it is not done in the Roman Church nor was it done in the Church of England before the Reformation. It has no rubrical authority and so far as I know no doctrinal significance. Personally I regard the ceremony as a matter of indifference.

I remain

Yours faithfully,

N. Jones.

Dear Sir

In reply to your letter of the 23rd inst. I beg to say, (1) The stole has been declared an illegal vestment in the Church of England. That applies to the ordinary black stole as well as to a coloured one. The rule of the law is clear on it.

Does not in my opinion make it more illegal.

(2). Turning to the fact of the consecration of the stole as a vestment permitted to the Anglican Church and dated from the time of Archbishop Laud. As far as I am aware it is not done in the Anglican Church nor was it done in the days of Archbishop Laud.

Reformation. It was no more an authority and so far as I know no doctrinal significance. Personally I regard the ceremony as a matter of indifference.
